While some people are getting hired quickly, many others with significant barriers to employment are facing a long discouraging job search that kills job search motivation. People with a lack of employment history, skills gaps, disabilities, a reentry history, language and literacy challenges, homelessness and other barriers must wage a challenging and protracted job search to become employed. Research shows that after a month or so of constant rejection and a lack of job offers, many of these job seekers are giving up on the idea of getting a job and only job hunting a few hours a week if at all. This lack of job search activity becomes a major barrier to employment and will keep people from getting job offers.

The motivation strategies you use to get people started in job search are no match for the often overwhelming discouragement they face when job search takes much longer than they anticipated. It takes new and creative approaches to help people sustain a long job search. This webinar is filled with innovative program design and counseling strategies to help people sustain a long and rejection filled job search that will keep them motivated over the long haul to getting the job offer. Many of the ideas in this webinar came from people that had to job hunt for months to get a job offer.

While your traditional approaches to job search motivation can help people get started job hunting, they are not the right match or strong enough to help people deal with the constant rejection that comes with an exceptionally long job search. This innovative webinar is designed to help you provide the kind of program
